

In some cases, underground structures help preserve natural vegetation. Less damages is thus inflicted on the local and global ecological cycle.

Plant life, animal habitat and passages, and plant transpiration and respiration are maintained to a greater extent than with surface construction.